The need for a common language when implementing the Common Core

Abstract: When the Common Core was implemented in the schools across New York State it became immediately evident that a new language was being spoken. This meant it was necessary for those involved to learn a new Common Core Language. During the 2013-2014 school year I was fortunate to have time and opportunities to work with teachers, parents and students to better understand this common language. I will share a snapshot of the many experiences I had while working to better understand the language myself as well as my work with the parents and teachers across New York State and throughout the US and in Australia.
